Arrested on a Serious Charge.

Some curiosity was caused at the Baltimore Potomac depot this morning by a rather unusual arrest. A well-dressed genteel-look-lag young man came into the city by an early train, and walked to the corner of Sixth street and Fennsylvania avenue, where he was standing when another man walked up to him, and, touching him on the shoulder, walted him, and, touchting him on the shoulder, walted until the man turned around when he hand cuffed him and esceried him back to the depot. Detective Miller inquired from the detective what was the nature of the arrest, and received the reply that the young man had been followed from York, Pennsylvania, on the charge of epabezziing $40,000 from his employers in that city. The New York detective refused to give the names of any parties conserved, and took his prisoner away on the 8 o'clock train.

At the suggestion of Mr. Davidge, at 12:15 o'clock a recess was taken until 1 p. m.

During the Recess
the general outlook of the case was thoroughly discussed. The majority of spectators were satisfied in their own minds that in placing Guifeau on the stand the defeuse had made a mistake. "They had a strong defense prior to this," said a leading member of the bar to a knot of interested spectators: "but the intelligence, wit and unconcern of the prisoner will not, in my opinion, strengthen his plea of insantly with the lary. You may have observed that he is clear on every subject, and has a wonderful memory for dates. He has peculiar ideas on religion, and I concede that he is possibly a monomaniac on that subject, I will say this, though. Had he been my client, I never would have put him on the stand." Guitean's conduct has puzzled the experts. Their testimony will be very conflicting. Speaking on that subject at recess, one venerable officialeaid; "Them experts is going to mix things up mighty badly for the jury. I have been here thirty years and I never yet nearly fifty of them kind o' witnesses to examine. Prhaps they won't differ mightily. Guiteau was returned to the witness stand at I c'clock and his examination by Mr. Scoville was resumed.

Mr. Scoville said that there was a witness here from Columbus, Ohlo, who was anxious to leave for home to-night, He desired that Guiteau should step aside a while and place the witness on the stand.

Guiteau uttered the concluding words excitedly, emphasizing them by hammering the box-rail vigorously.
"What were the attempts to shoot you?"
The first was when that guard attempted to shoot me in my cell. He denied that he attempted to shoot me in my cell. He denied that he attempted to shoot me, but I know he did, but Gen. Crocker managed to hush the matter up. I saw him take out his key, open the door, and creep stealthily into my cell at 4 o'clock in the morning. I saw him approach revolver in hand, and I sprang up and selzed him, crying: My God, you are not going to shoat me! He had his pistol within eight inches of my head, and as we

"When did the idea of enter your mind?"

"It was established in my mind from the first of June last, and I never doubted the Divinity of my influence. I was haunted with the idea, and felt low spirited and depressed before I committed the act, but I feit relieved when it was over. I may say I felt perfectly bappy. My first words, when I entered my cell, were: 'Tinan's god it is over.' It was a weight lifted from my mind."

The prisoner then proceeded to relate some of the details of the shooting, concluding by saying that Foliceman Kearney arrested him first, almost instantly after he had fired the second shot. He said that he never attempted to escape, as it was his desire to be sent at once to jail. He never filed any recommendation with his application for public appointment. He simply told Gen. Garfield that he would get a number of prominent men to indorse him if it was necessary.

Guiteau, continuing, said that since he had been in joif he had written letters to President Arthur, but imagined from the way he had been irreated in other matters that these letters had never been delivered.

Col. Corkhill objected, and the objection was Col. Corkhill objected, and the objection was sustained.

Guiteau, without being asked, here added that white President Arthur was his friend, "and secured his present position through my "inspired action," he continued "I, have never asked any favors of him." Beferring to his suitagainst the New York Herold Guiteau, had that during the past few days to had addressed a note to James Gordon Homeit asking him to pay him $5,000 for the moral injury the Herold had done him (Guiteau.) He had no legal claim to suc the Herold, but knew Bennett to be a liberal-minded fellow, and thought possibly he might send the amount asked for. [Laughter.] Guiteau said this in all seriousness.

Mr. Scoville—"Have you ever had any other political aspirations?"

"Yes, It has been in my head for twenty years that I will some time be

President of the United States.

I believe if I get the nomination and am elec-ted it will be through another special dis-pensation of Frovidence." [Loud Laughter.]
"Did your political aspirations have any-thing to do with your not pressing that suit against the New York Herald?
"Yes; because I did not want the Herald to getdown on me, if I ran for President." [Laugh-ter.]

Judge Cox—"The defendant will confine himself to his direct narrative."
Guitean—"All right, Judge! I'll stick to it.
But this matter has been in my head twenty years, but I will say that I don't care a snap about being made President." [Laughter.]
Mr. Scoville again offered a portion of the interview published in the New York Herald in relation to the prisoner's desire to make a wealthy marriage.
The devermment objected, and the Court decided to admit the question in relation to the correspondence with ladies.
Guiteau said that the young man he supposed to be of the Herald came there, and among other things he suggested that he was looking for a wife.
"Was that a fact?" asked Mr. Scoville.

"Was that a fact?" asked Mr. Scoville,
"Yes, it was. There was nothing wrong about it. No harm in it, was there? I was a in all that he did. He was a Christian man. He hated all shams. Had no bad habits. He went through the Onelda Community, and was mostly a kyituous man. While there he had to do with three women in a very short time, but there was no pleasure in that kind of business. He at one time thought that the only way to get to Heaven was through the Onelda Community. He was a lawyer, and had practiced in Chicage and New York; but when he stopped, he pleked up his books and had them sent to Milwaukee, where they now were in the possession of the express company, if they had not been sold. That was three years ago. He kept a register of his law, business. He could not recollect the number of cases now, as it had passed from his mind. He did not know of any case in which a verdict was rendered for one of his clients. He though it that there was one case in which a judgment was obtained. It was a suit in which $500 or $600 was involved. His client's name was Bushell.

$560 or $600 was involved.

He did not know whether he still lived or not.
If he undertook anything he was determined to go through with it.

"You determined to kill Gen, Garfield, did you not?" pointedly put the Judge.

"I decline to answer. I did that under the inspiration of the Delty. I had no choice in the matter," replied Guiteau.

Witness then detailed his legal experience at length.

Witness then detailed his legal experience at length.

After some questions with regard to his motive for shooting the President, the witness flow off into a rage and cried: "I want it distinctly understood that the Delty and I shot Gen, Garfield. I was the spired; it was no personal matter."

"Did the Deity purchase that murderous pistol with which the President was shot?" asked Judge Porter.

"The Deity Inspired me to purchase the Distol."

"Were you inspired to borrow the money to purchase that murderous weapon?"

"That does not matter. I was inspired, and that is all there is about it." Guiteau was examined very sharply on this point, but held to his theory of divine influence, and, he said in conclusion, "It was the will of God that guided me into committing the murder so called. I did not kill him. The doctors did that." [Laughter.]

Did not contemplate the President's removal by any other means than murder. "I don't like that word murder," the prisoner shouted, hammering the box rail wildly. "I don't like that word, it places a wrong construction on this case."

But acting as I did as the agent of the Deity, it had to be done. I never had the first conception that Gen. Garfield's removal was a nurder. If it had not been for the political necessity General Garfield would never have been removed by me. I was under no political obligation, and had never held a political office."

Judge Porter here took 'up Guiteau's letter addressed to the White House sometime before the shooting, in which he had said he had made up his mind to remove the President.

"Now," asked Judge Porter, "Did you intend to remove Mr. Biaine also?"

Guiteau—"No: I had no such intention."

After reading the letter the lawyer pressed the prisoner closely, who persisted in rather incoherent and wild terms that he had conceived the idea weeks before the shooting, but never made up his mind until the 22d of June. He had undergone a great conflict in his mind, in which the will of the Deity finally prevailed.
